SCIENCE RACES SCIENCE

RUSSIA is still the world's mystery. No one knows in detail what is happening in that country.

But this much is clear: Russia's number one business is science.

This is perfectly logical for any people who have ambitions to succeed. Science can be of untold value in the life of any people.

But Russia is moved to action by another consideration. Today there are two poles among the nations: Russia and the United States. For good or ill, the future of humanity rests largely with these two nations. Their philosophies of life are almost totally different. We have the atomic bomb. At present, we are to keep the secret, so we are told. This spurs Russian scientists to work the harder. In turn, our scientists must speed up the race in order to remain ahead.

And so it goes. Where it will go, where the two nations will end, no one can now foresee.

Meanwhile, the world over, men grow more fearful. And the end is not yet.

NEWS FROM INSIDE GERMANY

by W. W. Adams

A GERMAN, highly educated, came to our country in his early twenties. He has taught for several years in one of our leading schools of higher learning. He is a grateful American citizen. No one could be more anti-Nazi than he.

He has just returned from a visit of some months inside Germany. Surely his report will shock even those who strongly wished to see Germany pay for her crime.

PALESTINE TENSE

PALESTINE is a small country. For more than two thousand years its influence in the affairs of nations has been small.

This situation is changing rapidly. While our papers are not playing up events in Palestine, there is no place on earth more explosive.

The reasons are many. As in ancient times, Palestine is at the crossroads of the nations. England, France, Russia, and other nations find Palestine in the middle of the highway of their national ambitions.

Palestine is also rich in raw materials, as are the surrounding countries. These encourage trade and trade produces clashes.

Again, religious ideals, interests, and prejudices clash in Palestine, as nowhere else in the world. Arabs and Jews spearhead these clashes. Of course economic interests are also involved. The Jews' need of a national home plays a vital part.

One wonders what peoples outside Palestine are fanning these flames.

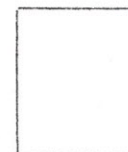

It is not news to learn that the Germans' cities are burned, and that millions of evacuees, including children, old people, and infirm, face only emptiness and starvation.

This is news. The Germans are not just defeated in war; they are defeated. They cannot see through, they do not understand. Denied access to freedom, truth, individual initiative and responsibility for fifteen years, they are blank and stunned.

Blackness—total moral depravity—prevails in areas occupied by non-German soldiers, particularly in areas controlled by soldiers from countries adjoining Germany. The law has broken down. The sanctities of life have disappeared. The women are at the mercy of Germany's conquerors.

This report is more than news. It is a study in human nature. It is the logical unfolding of the law of cause and effect. It disproves the saying: crime does not pay. Crime does pay! It pays in kind—and it pays high wages. The Germans know this to be true. This is a lesson none of us seem eager to learn.

MURDERED-AT HOME

by W. W. Adams

A POLICEMAN, after serving thirty years and seeing several of his comrades shot down in clashes with the underworld, fell dead in his own home, the victim of a bullet fired by his own jealous wife. The cause of the jealousy, real or imagined, is not known; nor is it of great importance. The point is, he was murdered—at home.

Less than a week ago, I gave a newly discharged soldier a ride of the first lap of the long journey to his home in Texas. He talked freely, and it was interesting, disturbing talk.

He had been a soldier for thirty-four months. He had fought in North Africa, Italy and Germany. His comrades in battle, many of whom had dropped at his side, represented several racial groups, and all religious groups. They had talked, trained, lived, laughed, fought, and hoped together. After the end of the war in Europe, he had come to know and respect several other national groups. He had come from cities and countries where all, employers and employees, had lost everything. All faced hunger, possible starvation.

During the three months between docking in New York and his discharge, he had observed much. Strikes on every hand. Radios and papers headlining clashed between owners and workers, neither satisfied with his plenty. Competing churches on opposite sides of the street did not seem as logical as before.

Then, to top it all, he had talked personally with a fellow soldier, an Italian, who had been released six months earlier. After donning civilian clothes, this Italian had been embarrassed on more than one occasion, as when, applying for work, he was asked, "What nationality are you?"

He was bothered, puzzled, and hurt. He had given much, had offered all, for high ideals; only to have them murdered—at home.

WORLD PEACE

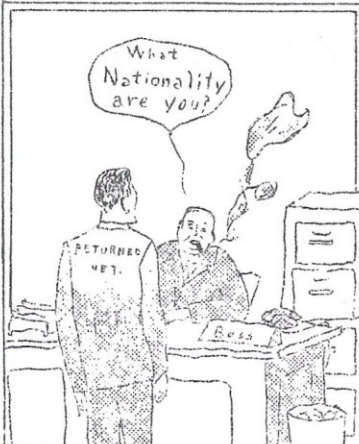

by Will Adams

WE are on our way. Or so we are told. They say lasting peace is here, but recently a European correspondent commented that the nations haven't learned a thing. It is still the same old selfish struggle for power, as was shown in the recently adjourned meeting of the Foreign Ministers. People have still not learned to think internationally, and they must, before lasting peace can be established.

The world has come part of the way. The Western Hemisphere is perhaps ahead of the eastern in international thinking; probably because we have not had the succession of wars that has been the Eastern Hemisphere's history.

America has always been a peace-loving nation. Being nationally unselfish, many of us have, for example, tried to understand Russia's viewpoint, and have seen that some of her demands are justified. America must not only lead the way, she must set the example.

We must take the long step from nationalism to internationalism or we are doomed; and Europe is not the only one to change. Americans, too, must readjust themselves. How many Americans are willing for the United Nations flag to fly above Old Glory, and for their children to salute both flags in school? We should be, for we must set the example. For this is a new experience for the world.

SCIENCE

SCIENCE IN THE NEWS

by the Staff

SCIENCE has played an important part in the war, and will probably play an even more important part in the peace. Science has advanced by leaps and bounds during the war. Many new things have been discovered and invented.

Among the discoveries is the key to the unlocking of the power of the universe — atomic energy. Because of this discovery, many new and more efficient inventions are now made possible. And the atomic bomb is only the beginning. Atomic power may be the thing needed to enable us to reach other planets. If the regulation of this power could be established, a teaspoonful of water could supply all the power that the Queen Mary uses in three round trips across the Atlantic Ocean.

Atomic energy is not the only great step taken during the war. Many other substances were invented. Some of these are: D. D. T., an insecticide, many medicines such as the sulfa drugs and penicillin, and atabrine, a substitute for Quinine.

Under the directorship of Bob Lawson, we shall attempt to give you a clearer understanding of a few aspects concerning science. Next month's topic will be, "Chemistry in Warfare."

• THE SUSPECTED MURDER CASE •

by Will Adams

THE trial of William Bengral was coming up in a few minutes, and the courtroom buzzed with excitement. He was charged with a $20,000 jewelry theft.

Bill Bengral had always been a hard lick sort of guy. He was co-owner of a small grocery store in Bloomingdale, Virginia. A few days after the robbery he had suddenly paid off a debt of $16,970, and no-one knew where the money had come from.

The jewels had not been recovered, although Carl Brogan, a pawn broker, claimed his clerk gave $17,000 to a man who came in with some jewels on November 6, thirteen days before. He said they had later been stolen.

Bill Bengral claimed to have been asleep at the time of the robbery, but could not prove it because he was alone. It was a pretty tight case against him.

The judge was pounding the desk for silence, the jury was seated, and the trial began. As it progressed, things looked pretty black for Bill Bengral. Finally when all the evidence had been presented, the judge spoke: "Although all suspicion points to the defendant, this case lacks some concrete evidence."

The prosecuting attorney rose. "Your Honor, if we could prove that the defendant actually pawned the jewels, would that convict him?"

"Yes, that would be sufficient."

"Very well, Mr. Brogan told me before the trial that his clerk, Ralph Smith, accepted the jewels from the defendant. I believe we could have Mr. Smith here tomorrow."

"All right, trial is suspended until tomorrow."

When the trial reopened next day, the prosecuting attorney had startling news. Ralph Smith had been murdered! His body had been identified by Mr. Brogan, his employer. Bill Bengral had been placed under a $500 bail, which he readily paid. Where had that money come from? The prosecuting attorney finished his report with, "I believe, Your Honor, that the murder of our only material witness, the fact that the murder was committed while the defendant was free, and also the clear motive, will be sufficient to convict him."

"Your Honor!" It was Bengral, the defendant speaking. He was obviously disturbed and excited. "I know now how I was framed. Last night a man loaned me $500 to bail myself out. This evidently was done so I would be free when the murder was committed. Is it not true that the man who loaned me the money is the murderer?"

"I wouldn't say anything so drastic as that, but, provided your story is true, he must have had something to do with it. Who is the man?"

Bill Bengral started to speak, but then froze, staring at the back of the courtroom. Suddenly two shots rang out, and he slumped to the floor. Two men ran out the main entrance. By the time things had quieted down and the judge had restored order, they had disappeared. A crowd gathered around Bengral. His attorney bent down and examined him. "He's not dead. Call an ambulance, quick!"

"I guess this clears him," the prosecutor said.

"It clears him of the murder, but he is still a robbery suspect," the judge answered.

Bengral was taken to the hospital where his condition was found to be serious. He might not even regain consciousness. In the meantime, detective James Montgomery of the F. B. I. was called in.

First he cross-examined several witnesses of the shooting. Only very slight and varied descriptions could be obtained. However a few days later, a cab driver walked into police headquarters. He said he remembered driving two men to a boarding house, and furnished full descriptions of them. He said he could take them to the house.

"The two men gave me $200 to keep quiet about where I had taken them," he said. "This aroused my suspicion, so I thought I had better tell about it."

"You did the right thing. Let's go."

The cab driver drove them to the boarding house without any trouble. There they found that the two men had moved out the night before, leaving no address. The landlady had not yet cleaned their room. Detective Montgomery and the chief of police made a thorough examination. They found an ash tray with some half smoked cigarettes in it. "Be careful not to touch that ash tray," Montgomery said. "It may have fingerprints on it."

The Chief carefully picked up one of the cigarettes. "Say, this is a special brand cigarette. There's only one store in town that sells this brand. Moreley's is closed today, but you can go over there first thing in the morning. In the meantime, I'll have this ash tray checked for fingerprints."

The next morning, Detective Montgomery went over to Moreley's Cigar store. "May I see Mr. Moreley," he asked as he flashed his badge.

"Yes, you may," the clerk answered. "He's in his office."

Montgomery walked in. "Mr. Moreley?" he asked. "I'm Detective Montgomery of the F. B. I. May I ask you a few questions?"

"Certainly. Come right in!"

"Mr. Moreley, do you sell this brand of cigarette?"

"Yes, I do."

Just then the phone rang, and Moreley answered. "Yes, he's here." Turning to Montgomery, "It's for you."

It was the police chief. "The lab reported two sets of fingerprints on that ash tray. One set is that of Tommy Marcelli, and the other cannot be identified."

"All right, thank you."

Montgomery turned away from the phone. "Mr. Moreley, we are after two men for attempted murder. We have the description of both of them, and we know one of them is Tommy Marcelli, one of the biggest professional gangsters in the country." He then described the two men and asked him if he remembered selling that particular brand of cigarette to them.

"Yes, I remember. The younger one is Jimmy Alcoe, (Cont'd on Page 5 Col. 1.)

LITTLE Mary, who had fallen ill, begged for a kitten. It was found that an operation was necessary for the child's cure, and that she must go to the hospital. The mother promised that if she would be very brave during this time of trial, she should have the very finest kitten to be found.

As Mary was coming out from under the influence of the anesthetic, the nurse heard her muttering, and, stooping, heard these words: "It's a bum way to bet a cat."

(Continued from Page 3.) and the older said his name was Jake Howell, but his description fits that of Tommy Marcelli."

"How come you know them?"

"They were customers of mine."

"Do you know where they went?"

"No, I didn't even know they had left."

"You say the other man was Jimmy Alcove?"

"That's right."

"How long had the two men been trading here?"

"Oh, about two weeks."

"Since October 5th?"

"Yes, I guess that's about right."

"All right. Thank you for the information. We'll call you if we need you again. Good day."

On the way back to the police station, Montgomery summed up the total information to himself. They knew who the men were, they knew their descriptions, they even had a picture of one of them. But as to their present whereabouts, they knew nothing. He knew that all railway stations, highways, and airports leading out of the city were being watched, but there was nothing to report. So he returned to headquarters, disheartened. The police chief had nothing new, either. "The only thing interesting around here now is the disappearance of the town bum. He hasn't been seen for a few days. Nobody misses him, but it is strange."

Montgomery started, then sank back in his chair with a pleased smile on his face. "I'm not so sure that has nothing to do with this case. It gives me an idea. Bring Brogan in. While he is here, send two men to the books in his pawn shop for a record of a clerk named Ralph Smith. Have a third man tap his telephone wire and listen in on every call."

"Well, I'm sure I don't see the point, but you're the boss."

In about half an hour, Brogan appeared. "Come in, Mr. Brogan. I want to ask you a few questions."

"Questions, questions! I am a busy man, Mr. Montgomery. I—."

"This will take only a few minutes, I assure you. You say the jewels were pawned by Bill Bengral, then stolen from your shop?"

"That's right."

"About when were they stolen?"

"About October 12th, shortly after he pawned them."

"Then why is it that the first time the police heard of the robbery was at the trial, a week later?"

"Well, I meant to report it, but, uh—, that is I—"

"Well, never mind. I have good news. We're about to get the murderer. I believe by tomorrow he'll be behind bars."

"Why, uh, that's fine. Who's your suspect?"

"I can't tell you now, but I'll let you know as soon as we get him. You wait here. I'll be back in a minute."

Montgomery stepped into the next room and phoned Brogan's Pawn Shop. He asked the policeman who answered how much longer he needed. He said it was safe to let Brogan go—that they would be finished by the time he got back. He then reentered the room. "I won't keep you any longer, Mr. Brogan."

"Thanks, I'm sure," Brogan said with disgust, and stormed out of the police station. He got back to the pawn shop as quickly as possible. On the way he passed two policemen going in the other direction who eyed him suspiciously.

He soon arrived at the shop and went straight to the phone. He dialed a number. "Hello, Marcelli? This is Brogan. Listen. Meet me in Carter's Restaurant in half an hour. Somethings up."

"I better not show myself. The cops know me. I'll send Alcove."

"Okay. So long."

"Hey, Montgomery!" The two policemen burst into the room. "There was no record at all of any Ralph Smith!" "Just as I thought," Montgomery said.

Just then the phone rang. "Hello, Montgomery? Clayborne speaking. Brogan just phoned Marcelli. Alcove and Brogan are going to meet in Carter's Restaurant in half an hour. Shall I pick 'em up?"

"Yes, bring them in. Don't let them know that Bengral is still alive. I'll send the squad car."

"Okay, Mr. Montgomery. So long."

Montgomery left the phone. "They're bringing Alcove and Brogan in."

The police chief looked a little bewildered. "Brogan, I thought, was on the level. Then there is no Ralph Smith, but we still got a body. I

IN the first seven-game World Series since 1910, two evenly matched teams, the Detroit Tigers and Chicago Cubs, participated with the Tigers winning, four games to three.

Hal Newhouser, of the Tigers, who was knocked out of the box in the first inning of the first game, came back and won the last game, nine to three.

The team batting averages were, Tigers, .273, and the Cubs, .263. This shows that the Cubs out-hit the Tigers but did not quite make the best of their hits.

Many previous World Series records were broken. Here are a few of the new records:

"I didn't kill him," Alcove squeaked. "It was Marcelli. Marcelli killed him!"

"Where is Marcelli?" Montgomery snapped.

"Apartment 3B, third floor rear at 1700 Virginia Avenue. But I didn't kill him!"

"Take him away," Montgomery ordered. "Pat, Clayborne, you two go pick up Marcelli. You heard the address."

"Okay, Montgomery."

"Just a minute. First you are going to do some explaining. I believe I am beginning to understand everything except one thing. If there is no Ralph Smith, then whose body do we have?"

"A very good question, and it was you who told me the answer."

"Me!?"

"Yes. What happened to your 'Town Bum'?"

"Oh!"

"He was murdered, given a shave, some new clothes, and Mr. Ralph Smith came into existence. Simple, eh?"

"Yes, maestro. I shall now check the fingerprints. I must say that was well done the way you tricked Al-

"Thanks."

Within an hour, they had Marcelli, Alcove, and Brogan all behind bars. The jewels were recovered in Marcelli's apartment. By the time the trial came up, Bengral was well enough to be there and identify Alcove as the man who loaned him the $500 dollars.

It seemed that Bengral had been saving money for many years to pay off the debt he owed, but could not prove it. He was shot when about to reveal Alcove's description. Marcelli, after he had been convicted of the murder, he was ex-

ted. Brogan was given life, and Alcove, being just a youngster and this his first offence, was given 15 years after he had been proven having had nothing to do with the murder.

By living carefully the next few years, Bengral, although he was not obligated to pay, was able to save the $500 which he held for Jimmy Alcove until he was paroled eight years later. With the $500 as a starter, Alcove was able to set himself up in business, and lived an honest citizen.

AROUND THE BREAKFAST TABLE

GAME — FOX, GUN, MAN

To break the monotonous silence now going on, Dank suddenly starts a peculiar speech. "The fox is the sacred totem animal of the Fox Indians. The only thing superior to the fox is the gun, which can shoot the fox. The only thing superior to the gun is the man who can shoot the gun. The only thing superior to the man is the fox, the sacred totem animal of the Fox Indians. Thus, the order of superiority is Fox, Gun, Man, Fox, etc. The sign for the fox is thumbs to ears and fingers outstretched; of the gun, holding the arms as if shooting; of the man, standing up with one's hands on their knees."

Standing before Fred, Dank holds his arms as if shooting. Fred must within ten seconds, give the sign for the man, which is directly superior to the gun. He does so. The game continues in this manner, with the one confronted doing the next action above the leader's. If one person fails to do so, he takes the leader's place, or is eliminated—which is decided upon previously. If elimination is decided upon, the last one left is the winner.

DEFINITIONS NOT FOUND IN THE DICTIONARY

FALSE DOCTRINE: Giving people the wrong medicine.

LUNATIC: Comes from two words; "luna" meaning moon, and "attic" meaning top story. So a lunatic is someone who moony in the top story.

HYPOTHESIS: Comes from two words; "hippo" meaning horse, and "thesis" meaning placing. So Hypothesis means putting something on a horse, and, more often than not, losing.
